

reach. "They're handicapped-access berries!" Burke declares.

By spring 2010, Burke realized he needed more land. With funds from the nonprofit Work Vessels for Veterans, which assists former service members in launching their own businesses, he acquired eight acres in Florida.

TODAY, ON WEEKENDS at the new farm, you can find veterans of conflicts ranging from the Korean War to the war in Iraq busy tending the soil. The camaraderie at the farm has been a source of comfort for returning soldiers trying to leave bad memories behind. Shaun Valdivia, a 26-year-old marine, came back from Afghanistan with TBI and PTSD—and a lot of guilt. "Why was I left relatively unscathed while my friends died or got seriously hurt?" he wondered. Valdivia, who felt isolated from civilian friends because of his combat experiences, was relieved to meet other recent vets at Burke's farm. "It's helped so much to get things off my chest."

Under the bright Florida sun, Burke climbs onto a tractor and pulls a plow across a field. Once he risked his life to pull a comrade out of the line of fire. Today, he's leading some of his fellow soldiers to a different kind of sanctuary. P
